Local Tidal Flooding Causes Concern

We recently experienced flooding up and down the 22 miles of my district due to the king tide—a combination of the supermoon, high tides, rising sea levels, and inclement weather. While king tide only occurs a few times per year, tides peak to a high and low water level twice a day in Southeast Florida.

Typically, the county experiences its highest tides during the months of August, September, October, and November. These high tides cause ocean and canal waters to rise, overtopping seawalls and travelling up storm drains into streets throughout the area, thus causing tidal (saltwater) flooding of those areas. If rainfall coincides with these predicted high tides, it can worsen coastal tidal flooding and cause stormwater (freshwater) flooding further inland. As the high tide moves into the stormwater pipes and catchbasins, the stormwater management system reaches capacity, which prevents stormwater from being discharged. This results in freshwater flooding of those neighborhoods upstream, since the stormwater cannot drain off the land until the tide recedes.

The county again anticipates more high tides October 24-31 and November 24-27. The next king tide is scheduled to occur Monday, October 26 (7:30 a.m.) and Tuesday, October 27 (8:19 a.m.).

This month, I will be attending a bipartisan conference of elected officials from coastal states around the country to raise awareness that coastal flooding demands more attention from our leaders. Coastal flooding poses a growing threat to businesses, residents, and tourism. As your county commissioner representing a coastal district, I will remain actively involved in addressing these important issues.

New Shuttle to PBIA

On October 16th, a new shuttle began operating between the Tri-Rail station in West Palm Beach and Palm Beach International Airport. The shuttle will meet every train that stops at the station, with the ride taking about 10 minutes to and from the airport. A future goal of the South Florida Regional Transportation Authority is to build another station that will be adjacent to the airport.
